Brief Summary

After passage of Senate Bill No. 237, Captive Cervid Farming Act, during the 2015 legislative session which permits the sale of venison, the decision was made to use the regulations in the Inspection of Nontraditional, Domesticated Animals to regulate how the venison was to be addressed. In order to use these regulations the exemption in §61-23D-6 should be eliminated from the regulations.

A change was also made in Chapter 19, Section 29 of the Code this past legislative session that allowed for the slaughter of rabbits outside an inspected meat processing facility and sections were added to allow the limited exemption and sales of rabbits outside of inspection.

Statement of Circumstances

The passage of SB 237 in the 2015 Legislative Session mandates rules be promulgated to cover the sale and slaughtering of captive cervids for venison. A change in the Code was also made to enable the slaughter of rabbits outside of licensed facilities which has been requested by numerous farmers within the state to enable the sale of rabbit meat which will have a great impact on the economic income of some individuals. An independent survey which was conducted by one of the state's rabbit producers collected evidence that many WV small farmers are raising meat rabbits but not able to sell the meat because they are hindered by the regulations before the change in the Code. If they are permitted to sell rabbit meat under the proposed rule it is estimated that producers expect to produce almost 25,000 pounds of rabbit meat with a substantial consumer market. Prices for rabbit meat range from $3.50 per pound to as high as $6.00 per pound. This could lead to a significant boost for small farmers. Average WV rabbit meat sales are expected to range between $86,838 and $148,866 annually.
